Look who’s in Rolling Stone’s top albums of 2024...

The Red Clay Strays - Made By These Moments (Rank #63)

While the Red Clay Strays have been mostly associated with country or roots music since the release of their 2022 album, Moment of Truth., the new Made By These Moments veers more toward the hard blues-rock of Los Angeles in the late Eighties and early Nineties than anything coming out of Nashville today. Tracks like the ominous “Disaster” and the roadhouse boogie of “Ramblin’” evoke Nineties bands the Four Horsemen and Junkyard — two L.A. groups that, while lumped into the fading MTV metal genre, were distinctly Southern rock in their sounds and influences. —J.H.

Maggie Rogers - Don’t Forget Me (Rank #65)

Maggie Rogers’ third album is a heavy emotional lift, but it’s an easygoing listen. Co-produced with Ian Fitchuk (who worked on Kacey Musgraves’ career-defining Golden Hour), Don’t Forget Me strips away the synth-steeped singer-songwriter production of her 2019 album, Heard It in a Past Life, and the alt-rock experimentation of 2022’s Surrender to reveal a rustic, more organic-feeling pop-rock sound. Upbeat tracks like “On and On and On” and “Never Going Home” are perfectly made for big-voiced singalongs. —M.G.

Maggie Rose - No One Gets Out Alive (Rank #72)

After years struggling to make it as a country artist, Maggie Rose changed up her sound on her past two albums, delving into R&B and country funk. No One Gets Out Alive cements her reinvention as one of the most successful in Nashville history. The album evokes vintage Carole King and Joni Mitchell, the Laurel Canyon scene, and hints of Eighties Sade. Rose is at her controlled best on ballads like “Too Young” and “Vanish,” but she allows herself to rock with abandon, too. — J.H.

Kicking off 2025 (but early is fine and appreciated): Drew & Ellie Holcomb “Memory Bank”
